New York Library Association, Urban Librarians Unite, and St. John's University Addressing Work Related Trauma in Frontline Urban Public Library Staff Summary

Urban Librarians Unite, in collaboration with the New York Library Association and St John's University, seeks a $106,225 Laura Bush 21st Century Librarian Program Grant in the National Forum/Continuing Education/Community Catalyst category. This project will explore how public librarians in urban centers experience trauma while providing library services and begin to create a framework for exploring institutional and individual solutions that will enable librarians to continue providing vital library services to communities in need while still caring for their well being.

Statement of National Need

As librarians are called upon to provide a wider assortment of non-traditional library services such as mental health first aid, administering Narcan, or providing library security, library staff are experiencing greater exposure to traumatic experiences, personal danger, and professional burnout. There has been an exciting uptick in the research around trauma informed librarianship and how this impacts library services. As Rebecca Miller, editor of Library Journal states in a recent article discussing burnout and stress in jobs in libraries "When the core of the work requires radical kindness and connection as it exposes workers to pain and suffering-as it does in our libraries—leaders must recognize the toll that takes and provide support. Self-care does not replace institutional care." (School Library Journal, August 27, 2019). While there have been positive conversations around such issues as self-care and vocational awe none of these studies have been focused on the impact upon the front line service provider. Discussions of self care put the onus for engagement and improvement on the individual librarian experiencing trauma and conversations of vocational awe encourage a disengagement with the issues and work which have, for many practitioners, become intrinsic to the work of the engaged public library professional. This study will shift the emphasis away from the individual professionals experiencing trauma and look at what institutions, professional organizations, and coworkers can do to support staff who are experiencing trauma in the midst of the work of modern engaged trauma informed librarianship.

Project Design

Our goals for this project are to appropriately delineate the problem of staff trauma in libraries and provide a framework to move forward for future discussion and best practices. To do that we plan to gather information from urban library staff using focus groups and a short survey, then bring staff together for a 3 day symposium to create a framework for moving forward. This work will be performed by leaders in the Urban Librarians Unite organization who have decades of public library work engaged in trauma response, by the leadership of the New York Library Association who will assist with logistics, by scholars from the St John's University ILS staff, and by a series of fellows from the St John's University graduate school who will support the work of scholars and practitioners as research assistants throughout the process including assisting in the administration and interpretation of focus groups, surveys, and the forum itself. They will be tasked with both administrative duties including note taking and logistics coordination as well as research and data collection.

Focus Groups

We will use a series of focus groups as a way to begin to tease out the issues and experiences of frontline staff in urban centers who may have encountered instances of traumatic public service or abuse on the job. These conversations will not have management present and will be performed in a space of anonymity and confidentiality so that participants can be assured of privacy. There will be separate focus groups for management and administration to share their experiences but these conversations will be kept apart from front line staff in the interest of anonymity for both front line and management privacy. Survey

The results of the focus groups will inform the creation of a short survey which can be shared widely to a broad cross section of the profession. This tool will include open ended questions, and answers will be used to inform engagement with the issue in the symposium discussion. This survey will be distributed through a variety of online communities, listservs, professional networks, state agencies (ie the New York Library Association & the Virginia Library Association), as well as through large library systems such as the New York, Brooklyn, and Queens Public Libraries. Participants will default to anonymity and this anonymity will be reinforced as the results come through the academic fellows Participants will be given the option of volunteering for consideration to participate in the final symposium.

National Forum

The Symposium which is at the center of this grant will be a three day event held in a large urban center in the United States in partnership with the local library system. All participants will be given access to the focus group and survey results no less than one month prior to the symposium. It will be set up along the lines of a "hackathon" with a positive mutually supportive environment that works relentlessly toward an answer of yes.

Symposium participants will be recruited from the focus groups and from volunteers who request to be considered in the survey tool. Paraprofessionals will be included in this and there will be representation at the Symposium of non-degree holding library workers. A small number of social workers who have a background working in libraries will be recruited. Administrator level staff including directors will be represented in small numbers to discuss policy possibilities and ways to implement change at organizational levels. These individuals will represent urban public libraries of various sizes from communities across the United States.

Report

The study will produce a report on the issues and ideas exposed in this process. This will include information gleaned from a review of the literature, the results of the survey, feedback from focus groups, and the findings & suggestions from the symposium. This report will be shared with participants, with state and national library association leadership, the leadership of various large urban libraries across the country. The report will also be available for free download from the Urban Librarians Unite, New York Library Association, and St John's websites.

Partners

The New York Library Association will be offering administrative and fiscal sponsorship for the project. St John's University will act as a recruitment space for research fellows as well as offer scholarly support and best practices for the survey, focus groups, and symposium. Urban Librarians Unite will provide contacts, research, and practical experience for the issues. Numerous large and important urban libraries have already offered support and commitment to the project including: Sacramento Public Library, Salt Lake City Public Library, Albany Public Library, New York Public Library, Brooklyn Public Library, and Queens Public Library.

Broad Impact

This study will impact public libraries across the United States. Initial research will be focused on urban public libraries in order to provide a focus for the research, but we hope that the process and framework we come up with will be useful in other library contexts. This exploratory project provides the opportunity to create tools and outcomes which will eventually have an impact on public library services as a whole.

Diversity Plan

Urban public libraries serve and in many cases are staffed by diverse populations. Minority members of the profession are often disproportionately subject to abuse from the public as well and this often leads to hidden stressors which make retention of diverse professionals that much more difficult. In order to ensure that those voices are represented and that their needs are considered in our research and results we plan to focus on recruiting participants in our focus groups and for the forum from marginalized populations. We will be actively looking for representation from librarians and library staff of color, neurodiverse makeup, sexual orientation, and gender expression.

Budget & Justification

This project is asking for $115,000. Of this award $50,000 will be spent on the symposium, $9,000 will be offered as honorariums for six graduate fellows at $1,500 per fellow, $30,000 will cover Urban Librarians Unites research and administration efforts, $11,000 will go to the New York Library Association for Indirect costs (6% of total budget), $5,000 will be spent on printing, marketing, and outreach, and $10,000 will cover the cost of travel and event costs for the focus groups.
